But does sitting outside watching a big-screen satellite television really constitute camping? "To me, it is not so much camping as living, but that's just my opinion," said Shaun Reilly, the assistant ranger at Morgan Creek Park, a 260-acre Linn County facility just west of Cedar Steven Fletchertag:blogger.com,1999:blog-8052733.post-65290904837861834902007-06-26T16:18:00.000-07:002007-06-26T16:25:19.988-07:00The Town of Waverly, New York, can't keep quiet about what it has to offer. And we can't blame the Town Council and the residents for wanting to boast. Waverly is one of just two towns in the Adirondack region -- the other being Port Henry -- that owns and operates a campground. Deerwood Park, just off Highway 20 in Evansdale, already has 132 sites for campers and 30-some spots for tents. Yet, patrons say by Friday evening it's tough to find a spot to camp at times and the park feels crowded due to the volume of campers, vehicles and people. The same goes for David Neel's 1962 Airstream Globetrotter trailer, a 19-foot rolling silver bullet he pulls with a 1963 Chevrolet truck. "It's been something that's been around America for a long
